NyECC Completes EPA Brownfields Assessment Grant: Building a Stronger Future for Our Communities

NyE Communities Coalition (NyECC) is proud to announce the successful completion of the EPA Brownfields Community-Wide Assessment Grant, marking an important milestone in helping communities across Nye County identify opportunities to safely redevelop underused properties. Brownfields are properties where real or suspected environmental contamination has made redevelopment difficult. Through this grant, NyECC partnered with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to assess these sites, identify potential environmental concerns, and provide communities with the information needed to transform them into safe, productive spaces that benefit residents for years to come.

Photo of Above Ground Storage Tank in Round Mountain, Nevada for the former Carver's Station which received a site visit as part of a Phase I and II ESA.

Grant Highlights

During the project, NyECC completed:

- ✓ 7 Phase I Environmental Site Assessments
- ✓ 5 Phase II Environmental Site Assessments
- ✓ 3 Site-Specific Quality Assurance Project Plans (QAPPs)

These assessments help determine whether environmental contamination exists and provide valuable data to guide cleanup efforts and future redevelopment.

Community Engagement Made the Difference

Community participation was an essential part of the project. Throughout the grant period, NyECC worked to keep residents informed and involved by:

- Participating in 2 Earth Day events
- Publishing 12 newsletters
- Delivering 3 coalition presentations
- Sharing 15 social media updates
- Creating 7 property fact sheets

These outreach efforts helped educate the public about Brownfields redevelopment while encouraging local input and collaboration.

Looking Ahead: A Bright Future for Redevelopment

The EPA Brownfields Community-Wide Assessment Grant has helped NyECC lay the foundation for transforming underused and environmentally challenged properties into safe, productive community assets. By identifying environmental concerns early and supporting informed redevelopment planning, this work contributes to healthier environments, stronger local economies, and more resilient communities.

NyECC is proud of the progress achieved through this grant and remains committed to supporting revitalization efforts that create lasting benefits for residents throughout the region.

Brownfields and Emerging Contaminants

Emerging contaminants (ECs), also known as contaminants of emerging concern (CEC), are newly identified synthetic or naturally occurring substances detected in environmental samples that pose risks to ecological systems or human health. Many ECs are not yet regulated under existing environmental laws and can originate from common sources such as agriculture, urban runoff, industrial processes, wastewater and household products.

As research advances and detection methods improve, these contaminants are increasingly being identified at brownfields sites, creating new challenges for environmental assessment, cleanup, redevelopment, and long-term management.

Emerging Contaminants of Concern

Per- and polyfluoroalkyl Substances (PFAS)

Often referred to as "forever chemicals," PFAS are a group of synthetic materials known for their persistence in the environment and resistance to degradation. PFAS have been widely used in common products like food packaging, firefighting foams, cosmetics, and many more. Due to their mobility and persistence, PFAS contamination has become a growing concern in soil, groundwater, and drinking water systems.

Microplastics

Microplastics are tiny plastic particles that originated from the breakdown of larger plastics or are manufactured for commercial and industrial uses. These particles are now found in oceans, drinking water and throughout the food web. Certain engineered nanoparticles associated with electronics and medicine are also receiving increased regulatory and scientific attention.

Lithium

Lithium is a naturally occurring soft alkali metal commonly used in batteries, pharmaceuticals, glass manufacturing, and renewable energy technologies. As demand for lithium increases, concerns regarding its presence in industrial waste streams, groundwater, and drinking water supplies continue to grow.

Common household batteries containing lithium metals

Pharmaceuticals and Personal Care Products

Personal care items aisle in a grocery store.

Pharmaceuticals and personal care products include over the counter and prescription medicines, veterinary drugs, lotions, sunscreens, and insect repellents. Compounds such as DEET, ibuprofen, acetaminophen may enter waterways through treated wastewater discharges and septic systems, where they can persist in aquatic environments.

Emerging Contaminants at Brownfields Sites

ECs are increasingly being identified at brownfields sites due to historical land uses. Former industrial activities, dry cleaners, agricultural operations, and landfills may have released contaminants into soil, groundwater, or surface water over time. The presence of ECs at brownfields sites can complicate redevelopment efforts by increasing investigation requirements, extending cleanup timelines, and creating additional regulatory and community concerns. Addressing these contaminants is important not only for environmental compliance, but also for protecting public health and supporting successful property reuse.

Brownfields Policy and Regulatory Updates

As federal and state agencies continue to study emerging contaminants, screening levels, guidance documents, and regulatory frameworks are evolving rapidly. Staying informed about these developments is critical during the Phase I/Phase II Environmental Site Assessment (ESA) process to support regulatory compliance, risk management and appropriate cleanup planning.

Understanding how emerging contaminants may affect brownfields redevelopment can help communities developers, and property owners make informed decisions while preparing for future regulatory requirements.
